PROGRAM SUMMARY

Hawaii's tourism slump has been going on for almost two years. We're just now beginning to see signs of a rebound. Coincidentally we're seeing airlines adding new capacity to Hawaii. But is that a coincidence? Local economists now say lack of capacity constrained tourism far more than the recession did. That's why it's such welcome news that airlines are ramping up their flights to Hawaii. To at least some extent, if we can fly them, they will come.

Chances are, you prefer two Honolulu newspapers to one, even if you don't subscribe to both of them yourself. And clearly the economic circumstances that could leave us with one newspaper are to be regretted. Our people here at Hawaii news now just went through a similar process: I know how it feels. Yet there are some glimmers of hope in these developments. We know the next few months will be very difficult and full of anxiety. We wish our colleagues at the Advertiser and Star-Bulletin the very best in this endeavor.

Every year in the state, each employer pays a payroll tax. The money from this tax is the money paid out when people get unemployment checks. This tax could be a symbol for the difficulty of weathering a slump. If it's too low, the unemployed can't get their benefits. If it's too high, the burden on employers could actually create more job cuts. The economic lesson here... Taking from Peter to pay Paul can make it harder for Peter to pay Paul directly.

What did we learn from the recent tsunami warning and our reaction to it? We saw the vast majority of Hawaii residents respond calmly and with good cheer. But we also learned we don't pay much heed to monthly siren tests. Only now is it widely realized that many sirens aren't working. We also still seem not to have the supplies we need for bad weather or blackouts. So there's more we all can do to be ready for the next one.

PROGRAM SUMMARY

This locally-produced special, whose English title is "Exploring the Land that Sustains Us," focuses on sustainability. It is hosted by KGMB's Keahi Tucker. Prior to the arrival of Westerners, Hawaiians were able to prudently manage their resources via the "ahupua'a" system enabling entire communities to obtain sustenance and shelter from the land without depleting resources. Hawaiians had an inter-dependent relationship with the land and understood that the health and success of their people could only be achieved when the lands were cared for properly. This program seeks to perpetuate land stewardship so that precious resources can be maintained for the future generations.
